Nature is known to be the purest form of life on Earth while humans are known to destruct its presence to satisfy their needs. What is not proposed is that we as a species embellish nature simply by being with it. We are the only species that is capable of exploring the unknown wonders of the Earth and its natural fulfillments. People research, capture, and add to the allure of Earth's creation while enjoying it to the maximum extent. Without humans, nature would exist, but not be known.

The contribution to the beauty of nature is achieved through humans and their unconscious desire to travel and admire their natural surroundings. The competence of man allows one to easily walk, drive, sail, or fly to the depths of nature presented in photographs 1 and 2. The paths guide one deeper into the immersion of nature as depicted throughout my set of photos. Photographs 3 through 6 simply exhibit the joy Earth's neutralities bring upon the human species when coexisting. As the enjoyment continues, people continue to observe and learn the perks of the wilderness as seen in photographs 7, 8, and 9. People can enhance nature's beauty just by merely being in it, as revealed in picture 10, or by physically modifying its features, similar to photograph 11. The twelfth photo perceives the act of capturing nature in the moment which could potentially help continue the cycle of researching, capturing, and amplifying the glorious aspects of Earth. Simply having me take these pictures can assist in the preserving of Earth's refinement rather than its corruption.
